

If I want to do business with someone, I will seek them out. There are other avenues, besides the telephone, for businesses to advertise and make themselves known. If a statement enabling businesses to contact any person on the Do Not Call list who the business has conducted business with during the last 18 months is added to the legislation, the telephone companies, the charge card companies, etc. can call anytime. These companies are attempting to "drum up" business; if they have it already, they do not need to be in contact with their customers.

Is this an attempt to drive people to cell phone use instead of targeted landlines?
